STEFAN RINCK

b. 1973, Homburg/Saar, DE Lives and works in Berlin, DE

Stefan Rinck is a German visual artist working primarily in stone sculpture. The artist's distinctively patterned and painstakingly chiseled motley crew of stone characters hail from a fantastic dreamworld: hominid bears, well- dressed dogs, smiling alligators, twisted gargoyles and other cartoonish creatures culled from contemporary culture and historical canons. He builds Boschian rock gardens of earthly delights – visions of pure whimsy, grim darkness and satirical wit that blend references as diverse as pop culture and Early Modern poetry.

Stefan Rinck (b. 1973, Homburg/Saar, DE; lives and works in Berlin, DE) studied Art History and Philosophy at the Universität des Saarlandes in Saarbrücken and Sculpture at the Academy of Arts in Karlsruhe. Rinck has had many gallery and museum exhibitions, including Skarstedt Gallery (New York, NY), de Hallen (Haarlem, The Netherlands), Sorry We're Closed (Brussels, Belgium), Vilma Gold (London), Semiose (Paris, France), Patricia Low Contemporary (Gstaad, St. Moritz, Switzerland), Gallery Rüdiger Schöttle (Munich, Germany), The Breeder (Athens, Greece), Galeria Alegria (Madrid, Spain) and Cruise&Callas (Berlin, Germany). He participated at the Busan Biennale in South Korea and at the Vent des Fôret in France where he installed permanent public sculptures. His works are in public collections including CBK Rotterdam (The Netherlands), Musée de la Loterie Belge (Belgium), Sammlung Krohne (Germany) and FRAC Corse (France), among others.

EARLY BIRDS AND LATE NIGHT LIZARDS

2023 NINO MIER GALLERY NEW YORK, NY, US

Nino Mier Gallery, New York is thrilled to announce Early Birds and Late Night Lizards, our second solo exhibition by the Berlin-based sculptor Stefan Rinck. Known for his playful and mischievous sculptures of animals and chimeras, Rinck expands his repertoire of large- and small-scale creatures chiseled with diabase, sandstone, marble, quartzite, and limestone in a series of new works on view from November 4 – December 16, 2023.

Rinck's new suite of sculptures experiment with our gaps in knowledge of dinosaurs. Drawn to the expansive imagination and play required in reconstructing what dinosaurs might have looked like, Rinck cites what little evidence we have of their forms and habits as his point of departure. The resulting cast of new reptilian and avian creatures bear varying degrees of resemblance to more commonplace illustrations of dinosaurs found in television and film but retain a pop cultural emphasis on archetypes and amusement.

Rather than present his dinosaurs as slobbering, ravenous predators, Rinck infuses them with human affects such as bemusement, indifference, and disapprobation. Some heavy-lidded figures seem bored to tears, while others grip their waists with sass. Yet others are entirely contemporary, bearing accessories like headphones. For over three centuries, we have speculated about the lives of the dinosaurs, attempting time and again to imagine their circumstances of life. For Rinck, the dinosaur is an avatar – the endeavor to understand it tells us as much about the extinct species as it tells us about our own.

As Rinck writes:

Only bones remain of the dinosaurs. Nevertheless, man has created a living image of them. How much knowledge is certain and how much is speculation? The distance between us and them leaves space for our imagination. Paleontology, which emerged in the late 18th century, doesn't just inquire about the lives of dinosaurs—it also inquires about our own species. The founder of paleontology, Georges Cuvier, believed that humans came into existence only long after the last Ice Age and the mass extinction of dinosaurs.

Much poetry lies in the distant view of lost time—one could read of it not only in the work of French writer Marcel Proust, but also in the books of the paleontologists. Josef Augusta, a Czechoslovakian paleontologist, writes in episodes about the lives of the dinosaurs in his novelistic books Blown Away Life and Petrified World. His texts are accompanied by illustrations of dinosaurs standing in psychedelic landscapes, painted by his student Zdenek. Within Zdenek's images, the dinosaurs appear passive and lost, but Augusta's text underscore their intentionality and autonomy. He relates, for instance, how an aged, gigantic Iguanodon knows where it must go at the end of its life: to the Iguanodon cemetery, where all Iguanodons go to die.

Attempts to quantify the number of dinosaur species and detail their appearance seem scientifically sound but are speculative. Thus, they open a window for art, to question appearances and activate the viewer's imagination. Augusta's narration is poetic and melancholic, reminiscent of Joseph von Eichendorff. You can smell the trees in these masterpieces of paleontology. They illustrate how human imagination can resurrect a forgotten world with just a few clues.

In Early Birds and Late Night Lizards, Stefan Rinck adds to the world fund of dinosaur interpretation a new version of figures, at once prehistoric and utterly contemporary. His stone sculptures will stimulate the imagination of future species proceeding our own.

SEMIGODS OF THE JOCKEY CLUB

2022 SKARSTEDT GALLERY EAST HAMPTON, NY, US

Skarstedt Gallery is delighted to announce an upcoming exhibition of new works by Stefan Rinck opening in East Hampton on July 28th. Titled Semigods of the Jockey Club, the show marks Rinck's first solo exhibition in New York.

For this exhibition, Rinck has brought to life a new cast of motley characters centered around themes of sports, gambling, and symbols of modern life. Best known for manipulating stones such as diabase, marble, quartzite, and sandstone through traditional hand-carving techniques, the works on view feature Rinck's signature textured and polished surfaces that allow the works to glisten and gleam as light hits the assorted man-made grooves or crystals inherent in some of the stones. This play of light activates the works with a sense of theatricality, aiding in the narrative elements of his figures. Inspired by French Romanesque, Pre-Columbian, and African sculpture, the works are imbued with an atavistic nature with a decidedly modern twist.

Sports and gambling collide in the layout of the exhibition, which is set up like a racetrack, with some figures about to race one another while others engage as spectators. Forecaster, with the results of the race emblazoned on the back of his mask, looms over the group, ominously aware of the outcome. Many objects on view sport the vestiges of the athletic activities they represent. Chief of the Feather Industry dons a tennis headband out of which sprouts a multitude of feathers, while Lifeguard clutches a ring buoy, his round belly indicating he may not quite be up for the task. Meanwhile, other characters are engaged in more nefarious activities, such as Wrong Bet Rabbit, whose name implies his misfortune while his shoulders slump as he hides his shame behind a mask. Then there is Modernistic Squeezer, whose bluffing strategies are revealed through Miro-inspired smiles and Brancusi-esque forms, or Two-armed bandit, so enamored by the slot machine that the symbols flash in his eyes.

With a total of twenty-four works, the exhibition also features creatures who expand upon Rinck's previous investigations into popular culture and contemporary society, embedding his pieces with references to film, mythology, art history, French culture, and literature. Marcel Proust's multi-volume magnum opus, In Search of Lost Time, serves as a thread that ties many of the exhibition's elements together. The title Semigods of the Jockey Club is itself is a subtle reference to Charles Swann, a primary character in the story whose membership in the prestigious Jockey Club indicates his stature in society, which slowly falters as political and personal events progress throughout the book. The Jockey Club, a real-life gentleman's club based in Paris, was originally founded as an authority on horse racing and breeding, linking the cultural elements latent within these objects to those which overtly symbolize sports and gambling. Likewise, Proust's exploration of involuntary memory speaks to Rinck's deft ability to harken back to another time and place while remaining firmly in the present, shifting timelines with unique ease and making his style as necessary to the meaning of his works as the actions and titles of the characters he creates.

TREMBLING OF THE VEIL

2022 SEMIOSE PARIS, FR

It's easy to imagine Stefan Rinck's sculptures in the distant future. Decades or centuries from now, we imagine these strange stone creatures standing in the clearing of a lush forest, nature in full reconquest. Covered in moss and eroded by rain, they forever rise as totemic emblems of a long gone humanity, revealing more mystical truths about our lives, hopes and dreams than a shattered iPhone screen or chassis of rusty automobile. Dreaming of this scenario highlights how timeless Rinck's works are; they look like they've been there for an eternity and will still survive when time has ceased to be recorded by our species.

When Rinck began to use his talents as a sculptor for creative and artistic purposes, he also began to consider his medium's ability to communicate with viewers. He quickly understood that this dialogue goes both ways. If he produces a sculpture that can speak to people outside his immediate circle and beyond a public keen on contemporary art, he can also find the content and the inspiration of his creativity in a vast choice of subjects from other places and other times. His artistic ambition, formal nuances and conception of the potential of the work of art began to be influenced by a variety of sources, including more traditional elements, unique to academic sculpture, such as forms borrowed from ancient sculptors and medieval stonemasons, but also from a pan-artistic lineage of Egyptian hieroglyphics, Aztec forms and ritual carvings from indigenous cultures. As Rinck's interest grew in this range of influences, without judgment or consideration of hierarchies, he also allowed himself to incorporate other references to his flourishing artistic panorama, such as comics, post-war fantasy literature or contemporary emojis.

His technique is as essential to the meaning of the work as is the content. It is also central to his identity as an artist and as a person. His sculptures begin as massive blocks of stone weighing up to twenty tons and guarried. The brutalist and heavy forms of these materials reflect his own stature, with his large hands of a sculptor, his broad shoulders and his stocky countenance. Before starting to carve, Rinck observes the block of stone. Taking into account its qualities and details, he integrates the structure of the rock into what will become the final form of the sculpture. He designs stone carving in a harmonious, almost Taoist way, and accepts the technical and structural qualities of stone, rather than working against them. No doubt Rinck must meditate deeply on elements and concepts that don't even have words in our language and can't be fully articulated - how part of the stone will respond to different forces from the varying angles of the chisel; where the grain of the stone is more or less likely to respond to pressure; how to prevent the stone from fragmenting along a vein; the tender places and those which resist. This knowledge is a form of expertise that the artist feels at his fingertips and throughout his body.

Rinck's works show how much he enjoys working with stone. It retains the traces that testify to the technique used to obtain the final shape. Rather than polishing the sandstone – which would be utterly ironic given the grainy quality of the sedimentary rock – he assumes a roughness in the finish that results from an accumulation of gestures. Sometimes a pattern of calibrated lines indicates where the air chisel has consistently struck. Other parts have a dotted surface, the result of repeated hammer and chisel percussion. Of course, there are also stretches of flat surfaces, which show the rotary traces of working with angle grinder discs. Together, these and other cutting techniques are used to design formal intricacies that create a convincing play of light and shadow on the surfaces of the work, but also form the costumes, teeth, hair and eyes of these characters. Their physical characteristics are at once abstract, technical and mimetic – as are ritual masks, comic drawings or folkloric illustrations.

The characters obtained have almost a totemic quality, like idols and fetishes that capture the most sensitive essence of their cultures. They are clumsy creatures with their stocky and massive proportions, like trolls or other popular figures. His sculptures evoke animals such as crocodiles or mammoths, creatures that appear in personified forms in mythology or even figures taken from comics .. Rinck's depictions have archetypal characteristics that allow his art to achieve universal and mystical ends; they favor the narrative, imaginative and marvelous predispositions that unite us beyond divisions, and reach an almost magical dimension, like children's drawings solidified and enlarged to a monumental scale.

Rinck's works are visitors to our time that have been formed by the fusion of the past and the distant. They speak in a soft, stoic voice. A voice that will resonate for future audiences and in conditions that are still impossible for us to imagine.

Abstración bárbara en la casa de los excéntricos

2021 GALERIA ALEGRIA BARCELONA, ES

The strange man is all that exists, treading the long and lonely road. But who is he? A magician who turns everything into nothing, no-one into someone, nothing into everything. Is he a philosophy? A history? A drama, or a novel? A religion? An art? Nobody knows. He doesn't know either. All I know is that he's done something right, despite the crushing weight of futility. He's someone new, special, someone who doesn't only disintegrate trees, evil beasts, giants and dwarves: above all, he disintegrates himself.

What is the psychology of savage abstraction? Abstraction, here, means exaltation and detachment. Psychology becomes distanced from the subject, and it takes on greater objective meaning. Matters of psychology are no longer a mere human ingredient, but rather an objective function of the physical artwork, of sculpture. Psychology moves from the specific to the general, from interpretation to the purely material. The pendulum swings between savageness and abstraction. They are not mutually exclusive. They become one. Detached psychology, inherent to abstraction, joins them by means of a magical connection. Even before the great outdoors gives these stone images a semblance of scenic obviousness, the connection must already have been there.

What is time? It never actually appears anywhere. Nobody even denies this. It simply does not appear; it is not taken into consideration. Today is like yesterday, like tomorrow and like today.

In its pure state, time is spellbound. In this state, savage sculpture emerges. Without any friction. Savage sculpture does not engage with time; time engages with it. It is not affected by the pace of historical process. It does not float in the river. It stays on the riverbank, motionless, watching on.

Stefan Rinck

Stefan Rinck (Germany, 1973) returns to Galería Alegría to present his exhibition Abstracción bárbara en la casa de los excéntricos. Joined by his characteristic cohort of stone figures and inscrutable idols, the artist takes over our main exhibition space with a new collection of sculptures that show striking originality and a bold central conceit. This exhibition further bolsters Rinck's position as a unique voice in contemporary international sculpture.

In this new show, Stefan Rinck explores the concept he calls "savage abstraction", a term he uses to try and identify that hazy area where history, psychology, ritual, fantasy, magic, aesthetics and manual skill all converge, those different approaches which bring to the surface all the mutant offspring and wondrous beasts that we have sought to hide away in the corners of our collective subconscious. Rinck, like a kind of modern shaman, throws himself into savage and unbiased sculpture, one which is capable of summoning supernatural creatures. The German artist revisits, as such, a recurring theme in his work: the persistence of the monster and the divine beast in the contemporary mindset. This time, however, he does not limit himself to exploring the mere concrete form of the idol, but rather its capacity to act as an echo chamber for more abstract concepts.

As a result, the analytical forms of contemporary life are called into question, given the frustrating survival of all those impulses that progress itself seems unable to quash. From these impulses, Rinck extracts his own peculiar and carnivalesque theogony. Furthermore, the idol's stony ruthlessness is joined, this time, by the contrasting nature of those "eccentrics", who could in fact be any one of us, as the powerless, confounded spectators we are. The present relevance of this work, which is both acutely amusing and disturbing, lies in its reverential fear of the unknown and the sublime ridiculousness of what is overly human.

The sheer mastery and undeniable quality of the sculptural work in Savage Abstraction in the House of the Eccentrics reveals a pantheon of cruel, parodic and inquisitive presences. The multiplicity of materials, the skill with which they have been handled and the overall sculptural calibre invite the spectator to become lost within the considered composition of these pieces, in all their emphatic presence. The work as a whole, full of detail, takes us back to our childhood obsessions with myths, monsters and marvellous beasts. As a new slant on this, and alongside beings that reflect the artist's own obsessions (crocodiles, skulls, gnomes and demons), we find new creatures defined by colder, more fearsome geometries. There is a certain chilling, mechanical quality to them, and there are also some more current and terrible gods... We witness new prophecies and new tensions: ultimately, these are new paths for such an extraordinary sculptor.

Stefan Rinck thus shows, in this new exhibition, that he can make stones talk, and he can bring to life those sardonic and sinister idols that we have long tried to forget, but which have managed to claw their way back to us, now in the form of his majestic sculptures. Therefore, it is a rare privilege for us that our gallery has become his "House of the Eccentrics", hosting work of such savage and uncanny abstraction.

Endemic Creatures

2021 CCA ANDRATX MALLORCA, ES

CCA Andratx is proud to present its second exhibition with Stefan Rinck. After "Pilgrimage to Kashyyyk" in 2017, "Endemic Creatures" is composed of new series created in and specifically for the CCA Andatx.

"Endemic Creatures" will take us on a journey through Rinck's personal imaginary. Strolling through medieval-like stone-carved sculptures, one can easily find himself embodying an archaeologist just about to decipher a mystery kept secret for centuries. However, our intuition will make us suspicious, sensing that behind these enigmatic figures complexity is hiding.

On a semiotic level, Rinck's works are born where symbols are at ease. Because of his deep knowledge in the history of sculpture and philosophy, he becomes a juggler of symbols, able to convey deeper concepts just by a swift innuendo. In his published catalogue, Bazon Brock names him "Master Stefan", probably not only for his talented sculpting skills, but surely for the originality of his art, being able to communicate deeply complex messages just as simply and clearly as the Medieval masters did

Facing the installation, the first thing we notice is that most of the sculptures represent animals. Rinck is aware of our ease to engage with a message when it's performed by an animal (just think of Disney movies). Personifying the animal, we attribute a human property, an identity trait, which sometimes is shared between different cultures and in different chronologies; as a kind of universal symbolism. Being able to read abstract concepts, either by association or by tradition, Rinck takes us a step further by introducing in the same work contradictory symbols. To externalize its meaning will entail an inner reading by the observer from his own experience. The sculpture personifies that Jester who tells us a hard truth "A man sees in the world what he carries in his heart"[1].

By using an extensive imaginary, boarding from art, literature, philosophy and cinema, Rinck re-reads these images within a contemporary approach. His works are able to combine antagonistic concepts in a perfect balance: deep fears seen from the most serene courage, evil and goodness at the same glance, the indiscernible mixture of fiction and reality; all these concepts seen through a contemporary kaleidoscope.

I FEEL AIR FROM OTHER PLANETS

2020 NINO MIER GALLERY LOS ANGELES, CA, US

Nino Mier Gallery is pleased to present a solo exhibition of over thirty sculptures by Berlin-based artist Stefan Rinck: I feel air from other planets. The artist's distinctively patterned and painstakingly chiseled, motley crew of stone characters hail from a fantastic dreamworld: hominid bears, well-dressed dogs, smiling alligators, twisted gargoyles and other cartoonish creatures culled from contemporary culture and historical cannons. For I feel air from other planets, Rinck has built a Hieronymus Bosch-like rock garden of earthly delights – a vision of pure whimsy, grim darkness and satirical wit.

Stefan Rinck also studied German literature and philosophy and finds inspiration in art, mythology, poetry and music. "I feel air from another planet…" begins the poem Transcendence by Stefan George (1868-1933), a prominent German Symbolist poet whose famous prose is the impetus for Rinck's exhibition. The artist's choice to employ this poem to frame his sculpted universe presents an open-ended and universal conversation about transformation, life, death and spiritually. Stefan George's poem reads:

I feel air from another planet.
The faces that once turned to me in friendship Pale in the darkness before me.
And trees and paths I loved grow wan
So that I hardly know them, and your light,
Beloved shadow – summoner of my torment –

Is now extinguished quite in deeper burning flames, In order, after the frenzy of warring confusion,

To appear in holy awe and yearning.

I dissolve into tones, circling, weaving, In groundless thanks and nameless praise, Surrendering without a wish to the mighty breathing.

A tempestuous wind overwhelms me In sacred rapture where the fervent cries Of praying women in the dust implore:

Then I behold how misty clouds disperse In the sun-suffused clear skies That only embrace on the farthest mountain retreats.

The ground shudders white and soft as whey. I climb across vast chasms, I feel myself floating above the furthest cloud In a sea of crystal radiance – I am but a spark of holy fire, I am but a thundering echo of the holy voice.[1]

In reading George's poem and discerning the multitude of references from ancient, medieval to Pop that appear in the anthropomorphic beings of Rinck's sculptures, we understand the exhibition as emerging from a heavily laden Symbolist mist, evoking a throng of personal readings to the contemporary viewer laced with a universal sensory experience.

The poem can also relate to Rinck's materials – geology speaking to that same poetic spiritual transformation. For instance, he uses diabas, an ancient, very dense subvolcanic black stone that is found in rare nests below the earth's surface.

He also uses sandstone, which exists in a variety of color variants and contains subtle twinkling glints. Sandstone is also made under pressure, but less violently, in an almost romantic way. It is sedimentary rock – so insignificant dust over time becomes the substance that now holds up elaborate cathedrals. Rinck also uses classic glimmering marble, which is created when limestone melts under enormous heat and pressure. Marble was famously favored by the ancients and artists in the Renaissance era who wished to represent sublime, heavenly bodies with its sparkle. Stone is seen as eternal and obstinate, but like all things, changes, and is utterly defined by the forces around it, in this case our very own planet, and by the hand of a fanciful artist.

Rinck describes the exhibition as a type of mini retrospective, specifically, the last ten years of his work collected in a daisy-chain of beloved ideas. Our collective histories and fantasies are played out in cartoonish stone by cultural icons like the Smurfs, Napoleon Bonaparte, Goddesses, Duck Dodgers, Boogeymen, Flatearthers, Scientologists, Court Jesters and Ninja Turtles. Rinck's subjects embody his guileless, even acerbic, humor while still embracing the playful joy of the barmy creatures. Taken within the context of Transcendence, this cast of characters speaks to the collective experience of yearning for spiritual renewal and transformation through the worship of strange heroes.

Stefan Rinck at Semiose, Paris

By Daniel S. Palmer

It is easy to imagine Stefan Rinck's sculptures in some far off, distant future. Decades or centuries from now, I envision Rinck's strange stone creatures in an overgrown forest clearing as the earth reclaims the built environment once we are gone. Moss covered and rain-worn, they will continue to stand enduringly as totemic emblems of a long-lost human race, revealing more mystical truths about our lives, hopes, and dreams than even a shattered iPhone screen or rusting automotive chassis. Dreaming up this scenario highlights how timeless Rinck's work is—a central quality of his oeuvre. His sculptures feel as if they have already existed for eons and will persist after time ceases to be recorded by our species.

As Rinck started to use his carving skills to creative and artistic ends, he began to contemplate the medium's ability to communicate with others through finished works of art. He quickly learned that this dialogue went in both directions. If an artwork he created could speak to others outside his immediate circle and extend beyond an art world audience, he could also find meaning and inspiration for his creativity in a vast array of material from other places and times. His artistic ambition, formal nuance, and conception of an artwork's potential began to be influenced by a variety of sources, including more traditional and classical material for academic sculptures, like the forms created by antique sculptors and medieval stone workers, as well as a pan-artistic lineage of Egyptian hieroglyphs, Aztec stone forms, and the ritual carvings of indigenous cultures. As Rinck's interest in these varied sources grew, without judgement or consideration of hierarchy, he was also encouraged to incorporate other interests into his bur- geoning artistic worldview, such as post-war comics, fantasy fiction and contem- porary emoji-like forms.

His technique is as essential to the meaning of his finished sculptures as their content. It is also completely central to who he is as an artist and person. His sculptures begin as massive stone blocks of weighing upwards of twenty tons that have been pulled from the quarry. The heaviness and rough, hulking forms of these materials reflect his own physique with his large hands, broad shoulders, and square features. Before he sets to carving, Rinck contemplates the block of stone. Considering its merits and features, he incorporates the structure of the rock into what will develop into the final form of his sculpture. He understands stone carving with an accepting manner that is almost Taoist and embraces the technical and structural qualities of the stone as they present themselves to him, rather than working against them. He must be deeply contemplative of elements and concepts that do not even have words in our language and can't be fully articulated—the way a piece of stone will respond to varying forces from different angles of a chisel; where the grain of the stone is more or less likely to respond to pressure; how to keep the stone from fragmenting along a vein; where it will be softer; and where it will resist. These bits of knowledge are a type of expertise that he feels in his fingertips and throughout his body.

Rinck's finished artworks show how he relishes this carving process. He leaves the marks that openly display the techniques used to achieve the final form. Rather than polish sandstone—which would be a fundamental irony, given the grainy quality that gives the sedimentary rock its name—he embraces a roughness in the completed work that results from the accumulation of his actions. At times a pattern of gouged lines indicates where a pneumatic drill has been pushed forward repeatedly. Other portions offer a dot-like terrain with a stippled surface that results from the more pointed repetition of hammer and chisel blows. Of course, there are also flat expanses, which show the rotary marks of his work with the discs of angle grinders. Collectively, these and other carving techniques are mobilized to produce formal complexities that conjure up a compelling interplay of shadow and light across the surfaces of the work, but also create the costumes and teeth, hair, eyes of his figures. Their physical features are at once abstract, technical, and mimetic—like ritual masks, folk illustrations or cartoon figures.

The resulting characters have an almost totemic quality to them, like the way idols and fetishes represent the truest essence of their cultures. They are awkward creatures with squat, sturdy proportions, like trolls or other folk figures. His sculptures sometimes evoke animals like crocodiles or mammoths, creatures that appear personified in mythology or figures from comics. Rinck's representations have archetypal characteristics that allow his art to achieve universalizing, superstitious ends, and emphasize the qualities storytelling, imagination, and wonderment that unite us across any divide. They contain an almost magical dimension, like children's drawings solidified and enlarged to a monumental scale.

Rinck's works are like visitors to our era, who have been formed by an amalgamation of the past and the foreign. They speak with a quiet yet stoic voice. A voice that will resonate with future audiences in contexts we can scarcely imagine today.

Stefan Rinck at Galeria Alegria

By Art Viewer Staff

"The strange man is all that exists, treading the long and lonely road. But who is he? A magician who turns everything into nothing, no-one into someone, nothing into everything. Is he a philosophy? A history? A drama, or a novel? A religion? An art? Nobody knows. He doesn't know either. All I know is that he's done something right, despite the crushing weight of futility. He's someone new, special, someone who doesn't only disintegrate trees, evil beasts, giants and dwarves: above all, he disintegrates himself.

What is the psychology of savage abstraction? Abstraction, here, means exaltation and detachment. Psychology becomes distanced from the subject, and it takes on greater objective meaning. Matters of psychology are no longer a mere human ingredient, but rather an objective function of the physical artwork, of sculpture. Psychology moves from the specic to the general, from interpretation to the purely material. The pendulum swings between savageness and abstraction. They are not mutually exclusive. They become one. Detached psychology, inherent to abstraction, joins them by means of a magical connection. Even before the great outdoors gives these stone images a semblance of scenic obviousness, the connection must already have been there.

What is time? It never actually appears anywhere. Nobody even denies this. It simply does not appear; it is not taken into consideration. Today is like yesterday, like tomorrow and like today.

In its pure state, time is spellbound. In this state, savage sculpture emerges. Without any friction. Savage sculpture does not engage with time; time engages with it. It is not aected by the pace of historical process. It does not oat in the river. It stays on the riverbank, motionless, watching on."

-Stefan Rinck

Stefan Rinck (Germany, 1973) returns to Galería Alegría to present his exhibition Abstracción bárbara en la casa de los excéntricos. Joined by his characteristic cohort of stone gures and inscrutable idols, the artist takes over our main exhibition space with a new collection of sculptures that show striking originality and a bold central conceit. This exhibition further bolsters Rinck's position as a unique voice in contemporary international sculpture.

In this new show, Stefan Rinck explores the concept he calls "savage abstraction", a term he uses to try and identify that hazy area where history, psychology, ritual, fantasy, magic, aesthetics and manual skill all converge, those dierent approaches which bring to the surface all the mutant ospring and wondrous beasts that we have sought to hide away in the corners of our collective subconscious. Rinck, like a kind of modern shaman, throws himself into savage and unbiased sculpture, one which is capable of summoning supernatural creatures. The German artist revisits, as such, a recurring theme in his work: the persistence of the monster and the divine beast in the contemporary mindset. This time, however, he does not limit himself to exploring the mere concrete form of the idol, but rather its capacity to act as an echo chamber for more abstract concepts.

As a result, the analytical forms of contemporary life are called into question, given the frustrating survival of all those impulses that progress itself seems unable to quash. From these impulses, Rinck extracts his own peculiar and carnivalesque theogony. Furthermore, the idol's stony ruthlessness is joined, this time, by the contrasting nature of those "eccentrics", who could in fact be any one of us, as the powerless, confounded spectators we are. The present relevance of this work, which is both acutely amusing and disturbing, lies in its reverential fear of the unknown and the sublime ridiculousness of what is overly human.

The sheer mastery and undeniable quality of the sculptural work in Savage Abstraction in the House of the Eccentrics reveals a pantheon of cruel, parodic and inquisitive presences. The multiplicity of materials, the skill with which they have been handled and the overall sculptural calibre invite the spectator to become lost within the considered composition of these pieces, in all their emphatic presence. The work as a whole, full of detail, takes us back to our childhood obsessions with myths, monsters and marvellous beasts. As a new slant on this, and alongside beings that reect the artist's own obsessions (crocodiles, skulls, gnomes and demons), we nd new creatures dened by colder, more fearsome geometries. There is a certain chilling, mechanical quality to them, and there are also some more current and terrible gods... We witness new prophecies and new tensions: ultimately, these are new paths for such an extraordinary sculptor.

Stefan Rinck thus shows, in this new exhibition, that he can make stones talk, and he can bring to life those sardonic and sinister idols that we have long tried to forget, but which have managed to claw their way back to us, now in the form of his majestic sculptures. Therefore, it is a rare privilege for us that our gallery has become his "House of the Eccentrics", hosting work of such savage and uncanny abstraction.

Stefan Rinck for Emerige Paris

By French Ministery of Culture

Evoking archaic gargoyles escaped from a belfry, "The Mongooses" by Stefan Rinck form a totem with triple face and triple body, displaying the forbidden expression of those who wonder about their condition. As part of a recent artistic residency at the Quadrilatere, at the Maladrerie Saint-Lazare de Beauvais, the artist has created a set of huge sculptures in a playful appearance, exposed in the open air under a title borrowed from a documentary shot in 1953 by Chris Marker and Alain Resnais, and denouncing the lack of visibility of African art in museums: "Statues also die". Among these monumental and mutilated statues is this set of three mongooses carved from a block of Italian limestone and weighing ten tons.

Unique piece, they are to be considered as an allegory, a reminder or a warning to the public of the artist-craftsman in front of the raw material, as a prelude to all the craftsmen of excellence installed on the edge of Beaupassage.

Beyond, they can be seen as a specimen of the work of an iconoclastic artist creating a chimeric, grotesque and mythological bestiary, an echo of stone to the cardboard forest of Eva Jospin

The Mongooses were exhibited in October 2017 at the Jardin des Tuileries, in the Hors-les-Murs of the FIAC. Thanks to his deep knowledge of the history of sculpture and philosophy, Stefan Rinck juggles with symbols and manages to convey profound concepts in the simplicity of the gesture.

A stone sculptor, Stefan Rinck exhibits in the galleries of the German capital, but also in Brussels, Athens, Munich, Madrid, St. Moritz, London, etc. It is also present in private and public collections, such as that of FRAC Corse (Corte, FR), Vents des Forêts, CBK Rotterdam, (Rotterdam, NL) or the Museum De Hallen, (Haarlem, NL).

Born in 1973 in Hombourg, Saarland, Stefan Rinck lives and works in Berlin.

The Beaupassage programme, designed by the Franklin Azzi architecture and B&B architecture cabinets, includes gourmet shops, accommodation and oces. For this passage, Emerige has commissioned ve artists: Romain Bernini, Fabrice Hyber, Eva Jospin, Stefan Rinck and Marc Vellay.

Les mini-monstres de l'artiste allemand Stefan Rinck à découvrir à Château-Gontier

By Kristell Le Gall

Stefan Rinck | WEST FRANCE

Stefan Rinck's baby face breaks into a burst of laughter when a fly flies off one of his statues. The character is posed: although recognized in the world of contemporary art, the German is not the type to hide behind any pretension. For this big guy, the simpler, the better.Gargoyles and aristocrats For a solo French premiere outside the walls of a gallery, Stefan Rinck chose Mayenne, Château-Gontier, its contemporary art center of national interest and its Genêteil chapel. With Carnival, it offers visitors the opportunity to discover around twenty statues.

"I arranged them as if they were doing a fashion show," the artist laughs. But instead of supermodels, he preferred to honor monsters. "I'm not interested in beauty, more in weird characters."

The setting of the chapel was ideal, for those who claim to be inspired by French Romanesque art. Some statues look like gargoyles, others like aristocrats from the Middle Ages. Between alabaster, marble and sandstone, the works often have animal faces. "There, it's an owl who behaves like a politician; here, a very chic demon; alongside an arsonist who has his head on fire," describes Stefan Rinck.

The statues are the measure of their creator, sometimes reaching the quintal. But we are still far from the monumental works signed by the German artist. Exhibited for the international contemporary art fair in Paris in 2017, they sometimes weigh several tons. "I do small, medium, large and extra large," laughs the German.

"I like the humor in his statues," says Bertrand Godot, head of contemporary art at Le Carré. It is sculpture in the classic sense of the term. I had flashed on his works in a gallery in Paris.

Stefan Rinck: Metaphysical Casino

By Anne Bonnin

Stefan Rinck's stone figures form a motley and comical community of, for the most part, animals, chimeras and monsters. Dogs, foxes and wolves, rats and mice, bears, cats, monkeys, owls, frogs and even a tapir are to be found rubbing shoulders with one another. But these animals are not merely animals, they wear costumes and masks; are endowed with particular symbols or characteristics—a cross, a hatchet, a club, a mask or a hood; some bear the names of heroes of Greek mythology—Eurydice and Polyphemus; or of fairy tales—Pinocchio; or of legend—Romeo, Siegfried, Sancho; biblical names—Behemoth and Leviathan. Others have more functional titles—Executioner, Referee or Crusader. We also encounter modern-day monsters: a "Troglodyte with Wall Street", another "Troglodyte with a Mask" and even an "Angry Citizen". Rinck's sculpted figures make up a discordant but related assembly of non-humans: they come from elsewhere, an archaic imaginary world, woven from myths and legends.

In the Middle Ages, animals were the symbolic reflection of humanity, yet Rinck's creatures are in no way symbolic personifications. So, what does this bestiary of medieval inspiration mean today? With his collection of fauna, the artist is exploring a comical, imaginary yet realistic vein, breathing new life into its iconography, using a technique typical of the Middle Ages: sculpting his figures directly from stone.

With their individuality and powerful characterization, Rinck's sculptures remind us of the figures of Roman art, which populate the columns and tympana of churches. They share the same morphology and style: their small size—many of the sculptures measure between 50-60 cm—, the hybrid aspect of the chimera and monster, their grimacing facial expressions. They are also endowed with the telluric density of the gnome. These are grotesque figures, in which we recognize the vitalist comedy typical of medieval realism that Mikhaïl Bakhtine describes and which could be observed during the parades of jesters and buffoons at religious and popular festivities. The use of parody, which in those times permitted an inversion of common values and ecclesiastical and social hierarchies, also characterizes Rinck's art, with its atmosphere of masquerade and transgressive excess, reminding us of the Feast of Fools, into which Victor Hugo plunges his readers at the beginning of his novel "Notre-Dame de Paris" (1831).

The masquerade or carnival is a predominant theme and many of the animals wear masks or medieval harlequin costumes complete with ruff. This is the case with "Maître des plaisirs", "Roi soleil", "Bouffon", "La Boule", "Eurydike", "Romeo", "Mercury" and "The Fortuneteller" with his body in the form of a dice, who are all inspired by a baroque court ballet, the "Ballet des Fées des Forêts de Saint-Germain" (1625), a wonderful, pirouetting parody of the melodramas in fashion during the 17th century.

Yet if the Middle Ages seem to color Rinck's art, its frame of reference in fact crystalizes around a number of "Gothic" obsessions of the Romantic kind: a taste for mythology and folk tales, for different epochs and cultures for the fantastic or figures of hubris and excess.

His creatures have thus emancipated themselves from their architectural framework. Since their release, they have been travelling through time and space, they have spawned and formed hybrids with their Aztec, Inca, Amerindian, African, Pacific and European counterparts. Often rigid and erect, they resemble votive, funerary or domestic deities and when the artist groups them together on the same plinth, we seem to be confronted by a crowd, addressing us with the questions: Where do we come from? Who are we? Where are we going?

The titles also take on the role of costumes. The sculpture "Eurydike" is a skull placed on an outfit from the Renaissance period, whose ruff also doubles as the death's head's teeth. The sculpture "Orpheus" also features a skull. Of course the characters of Orpheus and Eurydice are strongly linked with death, yet without the titles, how could one imagine the subjects to be Eurydice the dyad and the handsome Orpheus? How could one identify Romeo as the masked rat or cat? Titles, attributes and appearance are all part of a play on the use of masks in this "Eternal Comedy of the Creatures 1", where the pieces are movable like pawns on a chessboard. Within this comedy, nothing is constant—certain sculptures bear names relating to their form: "Jack in the Box". The same is true of "Totem" and sometimes a dog is "Dog" and a fox is "Fox". And the Cyclops "Polyphemus", which resembles an unfinished golem, does have a head with one eye. Symbols have lost their power. Absurdity pushes towards its antidote—belief (the totem, deities)—or towards a concrete reality—where a cat is a cat—or towards blind and monstrous violence. There can be no misunderstanding: Rinck is the antithesis of formalism and postmodern relativism, which operate through signs and images, his figures are made from the very material of drama "the drama of landscape" (Victor Hugo), of the fauna and flora that humans destroy.

These small, carved rocks stand proudly erect: vertical islands, true to the original block from which they were extracted. They impose themselves through the immediacy of their simple presence. This stems from the primitive manner in which the material has been worked, which in turn shows though in their raw and even rough appearance. Traces of percussive blows are apparent and incisions are sometimes aggressive, particularly in the hard marble. The surface textures vary: sometimes gritty ("The Magic Cube, You Carry"), sometimes striated or polished ("Casinofretman"). The artist seeks to express himself through depth in the same way as an engraver uses lines and strokes.

So, is Rinck taking us back to the Stone Age? Yes, in the sense that sculpting directly from stone implies a certain relationship to the material, the physical gesture and the tools employed. This is somewhat rare in contemporary and modern art and even in classical art despite Michelangelo's belief that true sculptors sculpt directly from the raw material. A sculptor must understand the block of stone and let it express itself: his task is to extract a form from the raw material. The work of art is the result of a struggle between two opposing wills "the incisive will of the material" and "human willpower" (Gaston Bachelard 2). Thus, direct carving gives shape to the struggle against the raw material's resistance, a struggle that illustrates man's domination of nature. Should we not be retaking control of these primitive, cognitive gestures of conflict and inverse the destructive curve?

Rinck's sculptures are anchored in the surreal more than in reality, a surreal world that already existed, in nature, before it was observed by the human eye, to which it contributed in shaping. Perhaps they evoke a time when non-humans spoke, because humans listened to them? The fully realized human form is absent from Rinck's work, only present in the shape of the skull, associated with vanities and death—a recurring theme of his masquerades. A tree, surrounded by fallen skulls as its fruit, embodies in a sophisticated apotheosis, the vision of man locked into his madness in the heart of the jungle ("Kongotree" 3).

The grotesque moves towards the tragic and the masquerade to the danse macabre. The comic is tainted by melancholy, cruelty, anger or imperiousness. The invulnerable "Siegfried" seems lost on his toy boat. "Eurydice", her fists clenched, rails against Hades or perhaps Orpheus. As for the invincible Behemoth, leaning on his prehistoric club, he seems to be holding in his anger behind his predatory smile. The great "Chained Fret" is chained to a rock, adopted, domesticated, weighed down by mortality. These beings in sandstone, marble, basalt and granite are figures from the Terribilità: terrifying blocks of stone. A feeling of pathetic potency seeps from these miniaturized giants. They no longer wish to be the mirror of humanity and its destruction of the living world: the relief of the sculpted reflection in Ape with
